Abstract This article examines perceptions of observant dance teachers on aspects related to their professional world. The study included 119 teachers, graduates of the dance department at an academic-religious college of education in Israel. The data was collected through a structured questionnaire developed specifically for the study and through interviews with teachers. The data shows that the predictor for the perception of the contribution of dance lessons to pupils is the interrelations between dance and the inner world. The significance of these interrelations arises, among other things, in the finding that the teachers' choice of instruction of the art of dance allows them to realize themselves and mold a new path in the instruction of dance within a religious worldview, as part of an education system compatible with their own worldview.

1. Theoretical Background

1.1. The Choice of the Teaching Profession

Professional identity constitutes a part of the self-identity of a person and is defined as a sense of belonging to the profession and identification with it [1]. The profession a person chooses allows them to express the gamut of abilities, characteristics and preferences that make up the self [2].

Studies have found three main categories of motivations for choosing the teaching profession [3; 4; 5].

A. Intrinsic motivations – studies show that the intrinsic motivations – connected with the essence of the profession – are the most prominent in choosing it. These considerations are related to the satisfaction issuing from the work of teaching itself, and from its inherent characteristics, perceived by a person as matching their skills and personality [3; 5].

In studies dealing with the motivations for choosing teaching it was found that people who choose the profession are mostly people with a self-perception of having an ability to teach well, and who define themselves as people who love children, seeking an occupation entailing interpersonal communication. Active teachers had stressed utilitarian aspects, such as satisfaction and joy from the act of teaching itself and from the opportunity to promote children's interest in the subject matter they teach; potential for self-realization; a high level of autonomy; using professional knowledge, as well as an option to realize personal capacities at work [6; 7; 8].

B. Altruistic motivations – the perception of the teaching profession as a socially worthy profession, as it imparts a sense of vocation and of giving to the other, allows for an influence on the lives of children, a shaping of the future generation and an action towards a better society [9]. The altruistic perception is anchored in Jewish tradition as well as in the Christian, both of which view teaching as a social service of high moral value [6].

C. Extrinsic motivations – the instrumental aspects of the teaching profession, which are not part of its professional characteristics. These considerations relate to aspects such as social status and work conditions – long vacations, the level of pay, required profession and tenure. Another significant aspect is the fact that the teaching profession is suited to family life and parenting. [3; 6; 8].

1.2. Arts in Education

Theoreticians of education to the arts emphasize the value of teaching the arts to a person's process of forming their identity. In their view, arts studies are important to all pupils, and not only those specially gifted in the field, since the arts enhance development in the cognitive sphere and hone critical thinking, which refers to the aesthetic investigation in art and in life. In their view, the instruction of the arts calls for experiences that encourage pupils' development of imagination, sensitivity and awareness to their external and inner world. [10; 11; 12; 13].
