

Chemistry of Man's Environment

An undergraduate chemistry teacher training program

Since understanding the fundamentals of chemistry and the chemical aspects of our world is vital for every citizen in modern society and not only for prospective scientists, the purpose of our program would be to achieve teaching and educational objectives beyond those that dictate the accepted conventional study programs of existing chemistry departments.

Regardless of whether our physical growth can or cannot continue indefinitely, because our environment—the earth—is finite (1), the consequences of this growth pose unprecedented challenge to mankind, the essence of which is to assure both the future of man in society and the quality of human life within the limits of the natural environment we live in (2). The development of an intelligent decision-making citizen with respect to environmental problems is thus one of the tasks ahead for sound education. The relevance of environmental education (3)—a significant component of which is chemical education—to the contemporary needs of our society is therefore clear: it addresses itself to many of the crucial issues we face today (i.e., resources, energy, technological development, conservation of the environment and quality of life), while simultaneously meeting the requirement of "action on real problems" posed extensively on modern education in general and on science education (4) (chemical education included (5–6)) in particular.

Chemistry is perhaps the most basic discipline with respect to understanding and alleviating environmental problems (7–8). Nevertheless, in spite of the proliferation of either specific environmental chemistry courses offered particularly for nonscience majors (9, 10), the inclusion of environmentally oriented topics in existing courses (11, 12), and the many new environmentally oriented chemistry textbooks (13) (including new editions of elementary chemistry textbooks into which environmentally related topics have been incorporated (14)), no single full undergraduate environmentally oriented chemistry program appears to exist thus far.

Environmentally oriented undergraduate chemistry program—proposed to be offered at Haifa University-Oranim, the School of Education of the Kibbutz Movement in Israel—is suggested as the focal axis for an undergraduate chemistry teacher training program. Such a program—the presentation of which is the subject of this paper—is proposed as the first approximation of an appropriate model for similar programs elsewhere.

Rationale and Objectives

Since understanding the fundamentals of chemistry and the chemical aspects of our world is vital for every citizen in modern society and not only for prospective scientists, the purpose of such a unique program would be to achieve teaching and educational objectives beyond those that dictate the accepted conventional study programs of existing chemistry departments. This purpose will be achieved by emphasizing in chemistry its relevancy to the understanding of nature and to our capacity to cope successfully in an interdisciplinary manner with existing and future problems concerning society, environment, technology and quality of life. The proposed program is aimed to develop the "curriculum-proof (chemistry) teacher"—type (15); the teacher—who is capable of contributing his share in developing students into "curriculum-proof citizens." The curriculum was built in accordance with the prescription for new trends in chemistry instruction in the world, stressing the chemistry of the environment. The idea is therefore, not to "produce" competent environmental chemists for research or industry, but rather capable chemistry educators by means of a unique program, the essence of which is the chemistry of man's environment. Such chemistry is believed to be relevant to the needs of both teachers and their students. Therefore, the unique emphasis of the proposed program may attract potential educators who envision shaping the personalities of the citizens of the future as the purpose of their profession. Furthermore, by dealing with actual, central environmental problems in modern society, the program will strive to provide prospective students with the logical scientific framework and intellectual power necessary for the search for possible solutions and also will concurrently develop their capacity to decide upon the desired ones. It is educationally significant therefore, that the so-called "positive and constructive" aspects of environmental problems should be emphasized (i.e., the contribution of chemistry in the fields of water desalination, medicine and use of natural resources) and not necessarily only the "classical" emotionally involved negative aspects (i.e., the "contribution" of modern chemical industry or chemical products to air and water pollution). Understandably, the chemical principles and concepts of chemistry are always the same. What is different in the proposed program are the problems dealt with and the guiding philosophy.
