Immunology, and Comparative Pathology Frederick Becker, 1975-12-01 As was shown in the first two volumes of this series great strides have been made in identifying many of the agents or classes of substances responsible for carcinogenesis and in delineating their interactions with the cell. Clearly the aim of such studies is that once identified these agents can be eliminated from the environment. Yet despite these advances and the elimination of some important carcinogenic agents one major problem exists. It is a constant monitor of all oncologic study and diminishes the importance of every experiment and of every clinical observation. As we noted earlier that problem is our inability to define the malignant cell. It is through studies of the fundamental biology of tumors that we seek this definition. A vast amount of information has been gathered which describes what this cell does and to a lesser extent how it does it. But the why evades us. We have been unable to define the malignant cell save in broad terms by comparing it to its normal counterpart. The major problem appears to be that the malignant cell does so much. It is a chimera mystifyingly composed of normal activities and structures of phenotypic schizophrenia with embryonic fetal and adult characteristics and occasionally a hint of an unclassifiable capacity unique to malignant cells.

Hypoxia and Cancer Metastasis Daniele M. Gilkes, 2019-06-14 The present book is an attempt to provide a detailed review of studies that clarify our current understanding of the role of hypoxia in the progression of primary cancer to metastatic disease. It will enable researchers to discover the critical cellular changes that occur under hypoxic conditions and play a role in metastatic dissemination from the activation of hypoxia inducible factors HIF 1 and HIF 2 to the transcriptional profile changes that occur in cancer cells and promote cancer cell survival under detrimental conditions. Readers will discover the methods and challenges involved in imaging and quantifying the degree of hypoxia in a primary tumor. We will provide an understanding of the hypoxia induced phenotypes that influence heterogeneity alter the secretome and tumor microenvironment modify cellular metabolism and promote immune suppression and resistance to chemotherapy. Finally we will uncover the therapeutic strategies that are being devised to target the hypoxic microenvironment in the hopes of preventing metastasis and improving the efficacy of standard of care cancer treatments. This work is an up to date source of information on the challenges and complexity of the hypoxic tumor microenvironment. Basic and translational scientists post doctoral fellows graduate students and those interested in how tumors metastasize will find this book a reference that details how hypoxia influences metastatic disease.
