

Unlocking a Dual-Channel Pathway in CO₂ Hydrogenation to Methanol over Single-Site Zirconium on Amorphous Silica

Meng Yang, Jiafeng Yu,* Anna Zimina,* Bidyut Bikash Sarma, Jan-Dierk Grunwaldt, Habib Zada, Linkai Wang, and Jian Sun*

Abstract: Converting CO₂ into methanol on a large scale is of great significance in the sustainable methanol economy. Zirconia species are considered to be an essential support in Cu-based catalysts due to their excellent properties for CO₂ adsorption and activation. However, the evolution of Zr species during the reaction and the effect of their structure on the reaction pathways remain unclear. Herein, single-site Zr species in an amorphous SiO₂ matrix are created by enhancing the Zr–Si interaction in Cu/ZrO₂–SiO₂ catalysts. In situ X-ray absorption spectroscopy (XAS) reveals that the coordination environment of single-site Zr is sensitive to the atmosphere and reaction conditions. We demonstrate that the CO₂ adsorption occurs preferably on the interface of Cu and single-site Zr rather than on ZrO₂ nanoparticles. Methanol synthesis in reverse water-gas-shift (RWGS) + CO-hydro pathway is verified only over single-dispersed Zr sites, whereas the ordinary formate pathway occurs on ZrO₂ nanoparticles. Thus, it expands a non-competitive parallel pathway as a supplement to the dominant formate pathway, resulting in the enhancement of Cu activity sixfold and twofold based on Cu/SiO₂ and Cu/ZrO₂ catalysts, respectively. The establishment of this dual-channel pathway by single-site Zr species in this work opens new horizons for understanding the role of atomically dispersed oxides in catalysis science.

Introduction

The excessive emission of carbon dioxide has constantly contributed to climate change, which has resulted in urgent demands for mitigating the net emission. CO₂ hydrogenation to methanol becomes an alternative pathway to reduce the dependence on fossil fuels with the utilization of “green hydrogen” from clean energy and low-cost CO₂ capture technologies,^[1] because methanol is a large-scale transportable liquid energy carrier and a common feedstock for high value-added chemicals.^[2] In terms of methanol synthesis via CO₂ hydrogenation, it is difficult to make a trade-off between methanol selectivity and CO₂ conversion.^[3] Thermodynamically, methanol production is favorable at low temperatures due to exothermic reactions, while CO₂ conversion is limited by the poor catalytic activity at those conditions. CO₂ conversion will be enhanced with increasing reaction temperatures, but methanol selectivity dramatically drops at the same time due to the generation of by-product CO from strongly endothermic reverse water-gas shift reaction (RWGS) at high temperatures.^[4] Hence, it is crucial to develop well-performing catalysts with high methanol selectivity without sacrificing CO₂ conversion, thus producing more methanol.

Generally, Cu-based catalysts are considered to be highly active and cost-effective for CO₂ hydrogenation to methanol.^[5] They display strong support-dependent effects on catalytic performance and follow different reaction mechanisms.^[6] Both of Zr and Zn are essential components in the support of Cu-based methanol synthesis catalysts, where the fabrication of active Zn species, such as partially reduced ZnO,^[7] CuZn alloy^[8] and atomically dispersed Zn^[9] during reaction have been well investigated. However, the structure evolution of active Zr species at practical reaction conditions were less concerned. Usually, Zr species can act as both a support and an active component, giving rise to high intrinsic activity^[10] and following a typical formate pathway.^[11] The Lewis acidity,^[12] the strong Cu–Zr interaction,^[13] the formation of Cu–Zr compounds,^[14] Cu–ZrO₂ interface,^[15] ZrO₂ with tetragonal coordination or as an amorphous phase^[16] have positive roles in CO₂ activation.^[17] However, controversial statements about the active sites for intermediates conversion still exist. It has been reported that the reacting formate (HCOO–Zr) were located on ZrO₂ nanoparticles with two O atoms bonded to two adjacent Zr atoms,^[18] while Meunier et al. proposed that the adsorption of formate on Cu (HCOO–Cu) with two O atoms bonded to two Cu atoms was dominant reaction
