In the eve of St Brigid's Day, family members would gather round the fire to make St Brigid's Crosses. Often a girl in the youngest member of the family to make the first cross. Then, the whole family would gather together to make more. Crosses were then left on the mantelpiece for St Brigid to bless as she passed by the house that night. The cross would be hung above the door to keep the house and its occupants safe for another year. Crosses were also made for horses, cattle and chickens, as Brigid was a friend and protector of animals, especially cattle. There were many different variations of the St Brigid's cross, but probably the most famous is the four-legged cross with a central square, woven from rushes.

The original St Brigid's Cross was made of straw. Today, many children learn to make crosses in school and these are often blessed with holy water by the local priest.

'Bridal Bride'

In the night before St Brigid's Day, each family would place a glass of milk or a ribbon called 'Bridal Bride' under the eaves of the house or branch of a tree for the next morning. As the sun shined on the courtyard, the milk or glass of ribbon was believed to have healing properties and was used for many ailments and illnesses.
