

Figure 7.—This map shows the average of the lowest temperatures recorded each winter. As a rule, the lowest temperatures in the United States occur in the northern portions of North Dakota and Minnesota, usually about  $-40^{\circ}$  F., or slightly lower. The other extreme is found at Key West, Fla., where the lowest temperature for the year ordinarily does not go below  $50^{\circ}$ . Along the immediate Gulf coast the average annual minimum is  $22^{\circ}$  to  $27^{\circ}$ , whereas along the immediate Pacific coast it ranges from about  $25^{\circ}$  at the north to  $30^{\circ}$  at the south. The marine influence is markedly shown by the north and south trend of the isotherms along the Pacific coast, and is noticeable along the Atlantic coast, where the isothermal lines trend in a northeasterly direction as they approach the ocean and terminate at the coast several hundred miles farther north than the latitude at which they cross the Mississippi Valley. The tempering effect of the Great Lakes is shown by the trend of the isotherms along their lower shores in Michigan, Ohio, and New York.
