The Use of Cystatin C as a Marker of Glomerular Filtration Rate in Clinical Practice

Flávia S. Reis and Elias David-Neto

Abstract

In the assessment of kidney function, it is widely acknowledged that the glomerular filtration rate (GFR) represents the most reliable indicator of kidney function. Ensuring precision and accuracy in the measurement (mGFR) or estimation of this GFR (eGFR) is of paramount importance. Cystatin C has emerged as a GFR marker, supported by scientific evidence. In addition to glomerular filtration, other variables or circumstances can influence the serum level of cystatin C, which is known as a non-GFR determinants. There has been discussion about the incorporation of race or genetic ancestry into eGFR. It is important to establish the role of cystatin C in this context, as well as in others involving the decision to use nonindexed eGFR, as well as the choice of the best tool for adjusting drug doses. Equations have been developed to estimate GFR using cystatin C, and the limitations and accuracy of these equations are presented here.

Keywords: cystatin C, estimated glomerular filtration rate, kidney function, creatinine, measured GFR

1. Introduction

The kidneys are responsible for maintaining the body's homeostasis by performing several functions, including the ability to filter the blood in a complex and highly selective process. The human kidney is comprised of approximately one million nephrons, which individually performs the filtration rate per nephron, defined as the volume of fluid filtered by a single nephron in a given time. This physiological process takes place in a network of capillaries, a structure known as the glomerulus or Malpighian corpuscles, first described by the Italian physician Marcelo Malpighi in 1662. It is generally accepted that the glomerular filtration rate (GFR) is the best index of kidney function that can be used in clinical practice. This is based on the premise that glomerular filtration is a primary and essential step for the kidneys to perform many regulatory functions. It is also accepted that with the loss of the ability to ultrafiltrate the blood, the other functions are also impaired. The average GFR in healthy young adults is around 120 mL/min/1.73m². This means that the 2 million
