

Understanding the journey

Step 1: Target selection

We believe that unveiling disease biology and the potential targets for intervention is the key step in successful drug development. We do this through both progressing internal projects and by assessing external opportunities. Our scientists develop, review, evolve and validate ideas. While Ferring has traditionally focused on peptides, our research now extends to both small and large molecules.

Step 2: Lead Generation and optimization

Compound lead series are being identified and optimized by our scientists based on requirements to achieve the desired profile of the compound for biological activity, efficacy, and to rule out potential toxicity.

Step 3: Early development

To prepare for human clinical trials, the new molecule selected from our discovery process will be developed and tested under strict regulation and control for safety and toxicity.

Step 4: Clinical Research Phase I and II

Clinical trials to investigate the safety and tolerability of a new molecule will be conducted in healthy volunteers, followed by phase 2 trials, where the clinical proof of concept is investigated.
