The Tide of Advertising and Marketing, 1936 In the Quarter Robert William Chambers, 2020-09-28 The Place de la Concorde was packed and jammed with struggling surging humanity Pushed and crowded up to the second fountain clinging in bunches to the Obelisk overrunning the first fountain and covering the pedestals of the Cities of France it heaved shifted undulated like clusters of swarming ants In the open space about the second fountain was the Prefect of the Seine surrounded by a staff of officers He looked worn and anxious as he stood mopping the perspiration from his neck and glancing nervously at his men who were slowly and gently rolling back the mob On the bridge a battalion of red legged soldiers lounged leaning on their rifles To the right were long lines of cavalry in shining helmets and cuirasses The men sat motionless in their saddles their armor striking white fire in the fierce glow of the midday sun Ever and anon the faint flutter of a distant bugle announced the approach of more regiments Among the shrubbery of the Gardens a glimmer of orange and blue betrayed the lurking presence of the Guards Down the endless vistas of the double and quadruple rows of trees stretching out to the Arc and up the Cour la Reine long lines of scarlet were moving toward the central point the Place de la Concorde The horses of a squadron of hussars pawed and champed across the avenue the men in their pale blue jackets presenting a cool relief to the universal glare The Champs Elysees was deserted excepting by troops Not a civilian was to be seen on the bridge In front of the Madeleine three points of fire blazed and winked in the sun They were three cannon Suddenly over by the Obelisk began a hoarse murmur confused and dull at first but growing louder until it swelled into a deafening roar Long live Boulanger Down with Ferry Long live the Republic As the great wave of sound rose over the crowd and broke sullenly against the somber masses of the Palace of the Bourbons a thin shrill cry from the extreme right answered Vive la Commune Elliott laughed nervously
