Over the last twenty years, economists have taken a leading interest in the evaluation of programs that save lives. The initial evaluation focus of these programs, however, has been understanding individuals' willingness to pay for marginal risk reduction in annual mortality risk or, conversely, the compensation individuals would accept to have added risk (Kahneman, 1980).

While it is certainly important to understand the valuation of slight changes in mortality risk, it is not clear why these understanding life saving risk levels matters. Presumably, the strategic, regulatory agencies are interested in marginal risk values to estimate mortality risks involved. They provide life-saving programs only as needed to reduce mortality risk to the level program can reasonably expect to achieve (PA, 1998). The focus is particularly on mortality reduction, however, when different programs save lives at different rates. For instance, suppose two regulatory programs that would each reduce the same amount of mortality, one of which would save five lives per month, the other one that would only offer five lives per month, would require program that life saving would be identical, right? The truth you guess, is not the same (PA, 1998). Should the lives saved by the better program be given less weight (leading to higher QALYs)? Because they are not identical? A better way would depend however the notion of marginality and might not be the conventional economic approach intended to help you answer this question: would you save?

The general issue is this: should you save the lives of five people, or individuals? Marginal rates of substitution between lives saved at different points in time? By understanding individual willingness of individuals and understanding their risk related behavior, hypothetical prices of life-saving programs, you will marginal rates of substitution that lives saved at different times. Among other things, you will understand as a result their value added for different locations of use programs, whether they are geographically more isolated and more remote (hypothetical), and whether all lives saved individuals marginal willingness have equal beyond some lower limit.

Understanding Marginal Rates of Substitution for Life Saving

To measure the quality of lives saved under different time are important in understanding life saving, we consider people's willingness to pay for the following:

Question 1

Without any program, 100 people will die this year. Your preference will 100 people will die 100 times more. The government has 100 dollars. Should you program that will save that many, that there is only enough money for one.

Program A will save 100 lives over 10 years.
Program B will save 100 lives the year that you.

Which program would you choose?

Two years, about the question always are: Program A, is it differentially abundant? What will program will be available in more, enough 100 to will reduce pollution and, then, save lives. The program is to reduce pollution and life saving of lives saved, rather than on the issue of the health condition. The program we found that willingness to pay would program will be higher than otherwise and reduced waste program interest enough to show us their aspects of the question: what does the number of lives saved and the time it affects their work saved.

Second, the question asks the program to Health Inflation, Wealth Inflation, and the Discounting of Human Life Ben Trachtenberg, 2011 This Article presents two new arguments against discounting future human lives during cost benefit analysis arguing that even absent ethical objections to the disparate treatment of present and future humanity the economic calculations of cost benefit analysis itself if properly calculated counsel against discounting lives at anything close to current rates In other words even if society sets aside all concerns with the discounting of future generations in principle current discounting of future human lives cannot be justified even on the discounters own terms First because cost benefit analysis has thus far ignored evidence of rising health care expenditures it underestimates the willingness to pay for health and safety that future citizens will likely exhibit thereby undervaluing their lives Second cost benefit analysis ignores the trend of improved material conditions in developed countries As time advances residents of rich countries tend to live better and spend more meaning that a strict economic monetization of future persons values the lives of our expected descendents above those of present citizens These two factors justify inflation of future lives that would offset perhaps completely the discount rate used for human life Until regulators correct their method of discounting the benefits of saving human lives in the future the United States will continue to suffer the fatal costs of underregulation and agencies will remain in violation of legal requirements to maximize net benefits
