Count Hannibal Stanley John Weyman,1928      Count Hannibal: A Romance of the Court of France Stanley John Weyman,2020-09-28 He shouldered his way through the circle of courtiers who barred the road to the presence and in part hid her from observation He pushed past the table at which Charles and the Comte de Rochefoucauld had been playing primero and at which the latter still sat trifling idly with the cards Three more paces and he reached the King who stood in the ruelle with Rambouillet and the Italian Marshal It was the latter who a moment before had summoned his Majesty from his game Mademoiselle watching him go saw so much so much and the King s roving eyes and haggard face and the four figures posed apart in the fuller light of the upper half of the Chamber Then the circle of courtiers came together before her and she sat back on her stool A fluttering long drawn sigh escaped her Now if she could slip out and make her escape Now she looked round She was not far from the door to withdraw seemed easy But a staring whispering knot of gentlemen and pages blocked the way and the girl ignorant of the etiquette of the Court and with no more than a week s experience of Paris had not the courage to rise and pass alone through the group She had come to the Louvre this Saturday evening under the wing of Madame d Yverne her fianc s cousin By ill hap Madame had been summoned to the Princess Dowager s closet and perforce had left her Still Mademoiselle had her betrothed and in his charge had sat herself down to wait nothing loth in the great gallery where all was bustle and gaiety and entertainment For this the seventh day of the f tes held to celebrate the marriage of the King of Navarre and Charles s sister a marriage which was to reconcile the two factions of the Huguenots and the Catholics so long at war saw the Louvre as gay as full and as lively as the first of the f te days had found it and in the humours of the throng in the ceaseless passage of masks and maids of honour guards and bishops Swiss in the black white and green of Anjou and Huguenot nobles in more sombre habits the country bred girl had found recreation and to spare Until gradually the evening had worn away and she had begun to feel nervous and M de Tignonville her betrothed placing her in the embrasure of a window had gone to seek Madame She had waited for a time without much misgiving expecting each moment to see him return He would be back before she could count a hundred he would be back before she could number the leagues that separated her from her beloved province and the home by the Biscay Sea to which even in that brilliant scene her thoughts turned fondly But the minutes had passed and passed and he had not returned Worse in his place Tavannes not the Marshal but his brother Count Hannibal had found her he whose odious court at once a menace and an insult had subtly enveloped her for a week past He had sat down beside her he had taken possession of her and profiting by her inexperience had played on her fears and smiled at her dislike Finally whether she would or no he had swept her with him into the Chamber The rest had been an obsession a nightmare from which only the King s voice summoning Tavannes to his side had relieved her      Count Hannibal Stanley J.
