

The development of optics

Man has speculated about vision and light since antiquity. Plato thought that the eye emitted particles that made objects visible. Pythagoras thought that objects projected light particles into the eye. Aristotle thought that particles moved through waves from the objects to the eye. It was not until the 17th century that "light was cast" on its physical properties.

Light debate

The nature of light was long debated among scientists. Isaac Newton (1642-1727) believed light was composed of tiny particles. Christiaan Huygens later waves and explained the wave-like nature of light beams. Among them, the diffraction observed by Francesco Maria Grimaldi (1665-1720), the propagation of Christiaan Huygens is unique a light to a mechanical wave in physical environment. The experiment of the "double slit" by Thomas Young in 1801 and the equations by James Clerk Maxwell in 1864, that classified light among electromagnetic waves.

Light as a wave
 It happens not at the beginning of the wave nature of light in the 17th century. In 1801, Thomas Young's experiment confirmed it.

When passing through the two slits, the light from a narrow source is split or split or observed following a pattern.

Newton's experiment
 In 1666, Newton built the first prism experiment. He demonstrated that light rays could separate into a spectrum that a prism could also then recombine as white light.

Spectral light
 Newton used the same prism to recombine the spectrum back into white light. In this way, Newton's tests, he was able to prove that light that was considered white, was really made up of colored light that becomes their spectrum in different angles by refraction when passing through a prism. In fact, Newton gave it the name of "light spectrum".
