Accordingly, his editor Joseph Shaw wrote introductions to his stories, where he emphasized their «reality»: «If you kill a symbol, no crime is committed and no effect is produced. To constitute a murder, the victim must be a real human being of flesh and blood» (vi); Hammett himself supported this marketing strategy writing letters to the editor, as well as introductions and reviews where he used his past as a detective as his main asset to sell his stories and to contrast his realistic detectives and criminals with their fictitious
