Liquefaction Susceptibility

These data contain polygons that provide information regarding the relative liquefaction potential for Washington State. This data is part of a geodatabase that contains information regarding ground shaking magnitude. Liquefaction is a form of ground failure in which soil particles lose their strength and behave as liquid. Liquefaction is caused by strong ground shaking during seismic events. Polygons are classified as having "very low" to "high" relative liquefaction susceptibility. Liquefaction susceptibility is assigned based on factors outlined in: Fuguo, Guohua et al. (2006), "Estimating Liquefaction Risk in Plateau Regions in China," Journal of Geotechnical Engineering, 132(10), 809-816. The authors are grateful to the Washington State Department of Natural Resources' Geology and Earth and Seismicity and the State Office of Washington State, its county, Washington Division of Geology and Earth Resources (Open File Report 000-03) for providing the data, with all rights reserved.
