

THE ARCHAEOLOGICAL PROCESS

Doing archaeology at George Washington's Ferry Farm can be broken down into three basic steps.

01

DIGGING (EXCAVATION)

In this step, archaeologists dig, or excavate, for artifacts in the ground. Artifacts are any objects used, made, or modified for human use. People lost or discarded these artifacts in the past. For Ferry Farm archaeologists, digging usually only happens for two to three months out of the year.

STUDYING (ANALYSIS)

Archaeologists actually devote the most time to studying, or analyzing, the artifacts they dig up. In this step, they wash, label, catalog (by weighing, measuring, and describing), and sometimes, mend or conserve the artifacts. The point is to determine what has been excavated and, more importantly, what the artifacts tell us about the people of the past.

02

SHARING (EXHIBITION)

Finally, archaeologists share what they've learned about the artifacts they excavated and studied as well as what they learned about the people who used them. They may do this by helping to create a museum exhibit or presenting the information to the public at a museum event. They also publish their findings for their fellow archaeologists and other scholars.

"Being an archaeologist isn't a profession; it's a way of being, thinking and behaving."
Don Henson
