Lecture Notes on Dryden's Criticism

I. The selections from Dryden's criticism that you have read all rely on his general belief that poetry, because it is an imitation of an eternal or unchanging nature, can be claimed to be a vehicle for communicating universal truths. Note, though, that Dryden is in no sense a systematic theorist – in a sense, he doesn't need to be for two reasons: first, because the bases of his critical claims are themselves "truths" that have been established by history; and second, because he assumes that his audience has itself been taught these truths, and thus doesn't need arguments for why these truths are true.

II. Passages in Dryden's criticism:

p. 2251-2252 Two types of poets: the first, who can be seen "wrestling and torturing a word into another meaning," is like "witches" who are "justly hanged" and the second, who "creeps along with ten little words in every line," is a Leveler, whose "plainness" is a failure of "imagination." Look at how these two "types" set up by contrast Dryden's ideal of a poet, although specifying what that ideal might be is elusive.

p. 2252 Wit is universal, true in all languages.
