

Beauty is only skin deep

Nigel E Drury

J R Soc Med 2000;93:89–92

In The Iliad, Homer describes the epic battles of the Trojan war as vast armies sailed across the Aegean to rescue the Spartan queen Helen, said to be the most beautiful woman who ever lived¹. Many painters have since tried to recapture her image on canvas—but what did she actually look like? Debate over what constitutes beauty has raged since philosophy began. Most imagination has focused on the face, perhaps the most complex and captivating structure in nature, whose attractiveness influences much of our behaviour and social interaction². From Renaissance artists to the present day, the quantitative definition of human beauty has been a 'Holy Grail'; if the exact contours of the perfect face could be mapped, we would have a form that could not be bettered.

In medical practice, an understanding of beauty is important in various settings. Plastic, maxillofacial and orthodontic surgeons can enhance their outcomes by aiming towards an 'ultimate' aesthetic and functional state³. In breast disease, restoration of body form following mastectomy is of great importance to a woman, helping to restore her femininity and confidence. Indeed, the psychological effects of altered self-recognition may form part of a ruinous eating disorder.

Beauty is a perception, the physical form appreciated by the observer. Such a concept suggests that beauty comprises two distinct but competing elements—the one who is beautiful, and the other who considers the one beautiful. Both contribute to whether beauty is deemed to be present—the 'subject versus beholder' hypothesis. In this essay I ponder the motives of each side in turn and the impetus behind beauty itself.

'BEAUTY IS THE GIFT OF GOD'

Imagine that you are asked to divide a line so that the ratio of the shorter section to the longer section is equal to the ratio of the longer section to the whole line (Figure 1). For thousands of years, scholars have believed this to be the most aesthetically pleasing point at which to divide a line, known as the golden section. It is represented by the symbol ϕ deriving its name from the Greek sculptor Phidias who incorporated it into the basic dimensions of his most famous work, the Parthenon⁴. ϕ is related to so many aspects of beauty that Kepler called it the divine proportion⁵. There are countless examples in the natural world, from the pentagonal symmetry of flowers to the logarithmic spiral of the ammonite cephalopods^{5,6}. The association with beauty has led to its application in art throughout the ages. Michelangelo's Temptation and Expulsion from Eden is a well-known example (Figure 2)⁷. But perhaps the most famous illustration is Leonardo da Vinci's drawing of the Vitruvian man, relating the divine proportion to human anatomy—a universal phenomenon uninfluenced by race, age, sex or geographical and cultural factors¹. All human beings should have the genetic potential to attain these proportions. It is proposed that such a human form upholds the law of conservation of energy, allowing maximum performance with minimum effort, and the law of conservation of tissue, requiring a minimum number of cells to perform the tasks necessary for survival⁸. However, an individual may fall short of achieving peak efficiency because of genetic and environmental influences, principally malnutrition. Development towards the divine proportion is therefore a visible reflection of health and survival advantage¹.

When considered from the viewpoint of the 'selfish gene', attractiveness has been an issue since the dawn of sexual reproduction; Darwinian evolution relies on the principle of non-random selection. Progress needs a direction in which to move and this is formed principally by the 'survival of the fittest', reaching reproductive maturity and yielding offspring. However, a second filter is formed by competition for partners—sexual selection⁹. The natural variation within a species creates a range of phenotypes and thus a rank of survival advantage, with some better adapted to attract a partner than others, 'survival of the prettiest'. From an evolutionary aspect, function always precedes form⁶. If the genetic objective of life is to mate with the best available partner, any features promoting the owner's genome will be a favourable investment. Many species of fish are brightly coloured and intricately patterned, exposing themselves to predators in the effort to reproduce; the exquisite tail of a peacock may appear to be a costly luxury but has the clear aim of attracting a hen⁵. These characteristics may be intended to express an individual's ability to survive despite such extravagance⁷.
