Introduction

Reflection and reflective practice are two of the key buzzwords in professional and education practice at present. But what exactly do we mean by these terms and how can we develop our capacity for reflection? This article focuses on how to become more reflective in your professional practice whether as a clinician or educator. In it we define what we mean by reflection, identify the key stages in reflective practice and outline the main reflective practice skills.

Reflection on current practices

Before bringing about a change to current practices, the clinician needs to reflect on what is currently being practiced and what changes are required. A key factor in determining whether change is needed is the 'evidence base' relevant to the situation under consideration.

One of the most difficult tasks for educators is to help learners to relate theory to practice and reflection is one of the most important factors in achieving this synthesis. Unless this link is made then simply reading up on the evidence base is of little practical value. 'Evidence based practice needs to retain a practical focus and to build on reflective practice' (1).

This process is referred to as 'reflection on action' that is, it takes place after an event. Another aspect to reflective practice is 'reflection in action,' a more immediate reflection that takes place during the action. (2,3,4)

Reflective learning is 'the process of internally examining and exploring an issue of concern, triggered by an experience, which creates and clarifies meaning in terms of self, and which results in a changed conceptual perspective.' (2) In the discussion process of reflection, stages or levels of reflection have been identified. Mezirow identified seven steps of reflectivity in hierarchy, however Atkins in her analysis of the literature found that the differences between authors' accounts of the reflective processes are largely those of terminology, detail and the extent to which the processes are arranged in hierarchy. (2) She identified the following three key stages in the reflective processes:

Stages in reflective practice

1. Awareness - The first stage is triggered by an awareness of uncomfortable feelings and thoughts. This may arise because of some situation or event which does not unfold in the way we would expect. For example there may be an unexpected negative outcome of a usually reliable treatment option or perhaps a strong emotional reaction on the part of a learner. Of course it is also possible for surprising positive outcomes to leave us wondering what is the reason for the event. Either way there is some 'out of the ordinary' experience which causes us to begin reflecting.

Becoming A Reflective Educator John W. Brubacher,Charles W. Case,Timothy G. Reagan,1994 This book is designed to help teachers understand and develop the reflective practice skills that will help them to both survive and develop professionally in today's schools. The authors believe that the extra demands that teachers face today demand more than intuition, instinctive reaction, or a prepackaged set of techniques. Teachers must reflect on what is taking place, correctly perceive what the options are in a critical and analytical way, and make choices grounded in rational, conscious decision making to improve practice. Using real-life case studies, the book illustrates the three levels of reflective practice: reflection in practice, reflection on practice, and reflection for practice. Contexts of Nursing John Daly, 2009

Contexts of Nursing 3e builds on the strengths of previous editions and continues to provide nursing students with comprehensive coverage of core ideas and perspectives underpinning the practice of nursing. The new edition has been thoroughly revised and updated. New material on Cultural Awareness and Contemporary Approaches in Nursing has been introduced to reflect the realities of practice. Nursing themes are discussed and are supported by illustrated examples and evidence. Each chapter focuses on an area of study within the undergraduate nursing program, and the new edition continues its discussion.

Advanced Early Years Care and Education Iain MacLeod-Brudenell, 2004. This core textbook for foundation degrees covers the content of the 12 core outcomes at the appropriate depth and breadth, giving students a complete grounding in the basics of the subject.

Becoming a Reflective Practitioner Thunsinee Muangthong, 2023. This qualitative study aimed to understand how student teachers reflected on their teaching practice during their student teaching semester and their perceptions on using reflection as a tool to develop their teaching practices. One hundred and twenty-four written and oral reflections by fifteen student teachers were analyzed to categorize their reflections. In addition, semi-structured interviews were conducted with four participants to gain an in-depth understanding of their perceptions on reflection. The findings showed that student teachers' reflections addressed five main themes: instruction, management, relationships, learning experiences, and characteristics of effective teachers. Summary descriptive types included comparative and transformative, and that student teachers structured their written and oral reflection in various ways, including multiple types and multiple themes, one type with multiple themes, multiple types with one theme, and one type and one theme. Student teachers' perceptions on reflection focused on process and outcome. It is important to note that even though student teachers reflect in different themes, types, or structures, they see reflective thinking assignments as a useful tool to help them develop their teaching practices. Reflection on their own practice helped student teachers look back to see if there was any problem that happened so that they could connect to their knowledge and take action to develop their teaching practices. The study has important implications for teacher educators, teacher preparation programs, cooperating teachers, and student teachers. Teacher educators can encourage student teachers to recognize that reflective thinking is a common process for learning from their own experiences. The knowledge of themes, types, structures, and perceptions of reflection can be used to inform how teacher educators should assign reflection assignments for student teachers. Future research can be done on various factors such as types of reflection assignments, duration of time to collect the data, groups of participants, or
