Abstract

More than thirty years ago, the countries of the Eastern bloc experienced a significant societal rebirth in rejecting of totalitarianism. Over the years, these policies have taken steps that have led them to the current state of legal democracy and late capitalism. But every system we know has its perversions and inevitably leads to a social crisis. In his 'state-destroying' work The Power of the Powerless, Václav Havel presents several concepts that helped him describe the totalitarianism that the countries of the Eastern bloc experienced: 'post-totalitarian system', 'post-democracy', and 'dis-sent'. This paper argues in favor of the relevance of these concepts for the contemporary world, although, it will be claimed, its cruelty and inhumanity are much more subtle than in the regimes we have known so far.

The primary objective of this article is to draw parallels between well-known totalitarian regimes and the current (neo)liberal democracy through the conceptual framework of
