rain that he looked not much bigger than a honey bee and as different as possible from the smart pert airy little character that we had so often seen flirting with the flowers He was evidently a humming bird in adversity and whether he ever would hum again looked to us exceedingly doubtful Immediately however we sent out to have him taken in When the friendly hand seized him he gave a little faint watery squeak evidently thinking that his last hour was come and that grim Death was about to carry him off to the land of dead birds What a time we had reviving him holding the little wet thing in the warm hollow of our hands and feeling him shiver and palpitate His eyes were fast closed his tiny claws which looked slender as cobwebs were knotted close to his body and it was long before one could feel the least motion in them Finally to our great joy we felt a brisk little kick and then a flutter of wings and then a determined peck of the beak which showed that there was some bird left in him yet and that he meant at any rate to find out where he was
