Abstract

In a network of organisations the design of appropriate control mechanisms is important to prevent and detect opportunistic behaviour of the members of the network. In most cases, control mechanisms can already be seen in the business value model, because most controls add new exchanges of economic value between enterprises. However, controls encompass also operational aspects, not covered by business value models, but which are important for the understanding and operation of controls. We developed the e^3 -value methodology for designing inter-organisational control mechanisms, based on analysing value aspects of network organisations. We illustrate it with the case for the distribution of music tracks via Internet radio, where we apply the methodology to design a control to monitor whether Internet radio stations and Right Societies cleared the right amount of tracks. We present the control mechanism not only from a business value model perspective, but also from an operational perspective, thus showing that the control can indeed be implemented.

1. Introduction

In a network of organisations, the design of appropriate control mechanisms is important to prevent and detect opportunistic behaviour of the members of the network. There have been studies on inter-organizational controls in business research, mainly with objectives to explore and explain control mechanisms (see e.g. for an overview [3]), however they do not address the design of these control mechanisms. On the other hand, research on the design of networked business models ([1], [10], [11],[12]) concentrates mainly on economic value aspects, and neglects the control aspects.

In this paper we propose a four-step methodology to design inter-organisational control mechanisms, based on analysing the objects of value that are exchanged by enterprises, forming network organisations. To analyse these objects, we employ the e^3 -value approach [6]. In earlier work [8], [9], we have extended this e^3 -value approach for modelling inter-organizational control mechanisms (e^3 -value). A motivation to use a
