Abstract: This study addresses energy security from the perspective of comprehensive national defence, especially the interaction between military and civilian aspects of defence. Civilian infrastructure is seldom configured or developed with defence in focus. Therefore, with the aim of facilitating a system-level discussion, this study takes two steps. The first step is to develop indicators for assessing energy security in a comprehensive national defence setting. The second step is to qualitatively assess the effect on energy security from three different energy development scenarios related to either the development of local solar, wind, and bio-power production and storage; an increased resilience of the high voltage electric power transmission system; or an increase in large hydropower and nuclear power production. The study identifies that there are positive systemic effects of increasing the diversity of the energy system, especially for solutions that do not need external supply and do not risk creating large-scale effects if attacked. However, these changes to the energy system also lead to local changes that affect warfighting and defence. Such changes can be met by updated tactics and technology that would also give the defending force an advantage.

1. Introduction

Civilian infrastructure, such as national energy systems, is of great importance for defence forces with a focus on non-expeditionary national defence. However, such civilian infrastructure is seldom configured or developed with defence in focus. In a prolonged conflict, military units and their support require energy that directly and indirectly is dependent on the national civilian energy system. NATO defines “resilient energy supplies” as one of a nation’s seven baseline requirements [1]. In research, this dependence is addressed at the component level, e.g., in relation to military microgrids [2,3] and infrastructure protection coordination [4]. However, constructive suggestions for how to develop energy security, taking national defence into consideration, are limited.

The concept of energy security can help countries achieve economic stability [5], and the field provides guidance to stakeholders in solving transitional energy problems [6]. Energy security is a context-dependent concept [5], and there is a discussion on the need to expand the concept [7,8]. Von Hippel et al. [8] argue for adding new components such as environment, technology, and socio-cultural factors. Vivoda [9] argues for including aspects such as human security and geopolitical incidents when understanding energy security. Therefore, there are strong connections between comprehensive national defence, national resilience and territorial defence, and energy security [10].

Several approaches exist to assess energy security, including the 4A framework that relies on the four dimensions: Availability, Applicability, Acceptability, and Affordability [11]. The framework has proven to be a robust approach since it can add indicators depending on the contextual background [5]. This study addresses energy security from
