flicked it away. He observed all these things in this split part of a second that it took him to say those two words. It was almost a whole cigarette she had thrown away. She had been smoking it with evident enjoyment a moment before.

He stood there looking at her, with a sort of cold speculation.

In a way it unnerved her. Not that she was frightened; he seemed quite decent in his own way, and harmless; but he made her feel uncomfortable. If he had said something rude she would have preferred it. It would have been no more than she would have expected of him. But instead, this quiet contemptuous look. Yes, that was it. The thing began to take on definition in her mind. How dare he; the insolence.

"Well, what are you waiting for?" she said, because she felt she had to break the tension somehow.

"I am sorry I made you waste a whole cigarette," he said.

She laughed a little nervously. "It's nothing," she said, feeling a fool.

"There's plenty more where that came from, eh?"

"I suppose so."

This would not do. She had no intention of standing at a street corner jawing with - well, with a black man. There was something indecent about it. Why didn't he move on? As though he had read her thoughts he said,

"This is the street lady. It's public."

Well, anyway she didn't have to answer him. She could snub him quietly, the way she should have properly done from the start.

"It's a good thing you're a woman," he said.

"And if I were a man?"

"As man to man maybe I'd give you something to think about," he said, still in that quiet even voice.
