

A vibrant, colorful illustration depicting a scene from Aesop's fables. The central focus is the text "AESOP'S FABLES" in a white, serif font. Surrounding the text are various animals in a lush, green landscape. A fox is leaping through the air in the upper left, a wolf is jumping in the lower left, a rabbit and a turtle are running in the lower center, a lion is leaping in the lower right, a swan is flying in the upper right, a crow is flying in the upper center, and a mouse is running in the lower right. The background features a large tree with purple grapes, a nest, and a pitcher on a branch. The overall scene is bright and detailed, with a mix of green, yellow, and blue tones.

he even existed at all. Instead, any fable tended to be ascribed to the name of Aesop if there was no known alternative literary source. In Classical times there were various theorists who tried to differentiate these fables from other kinds of narration. They had to be short and unaffected; in addition, they are fictitious, useful to life, and true to nature. In them could be found talking animals and plants, although humans interacting only with humans figure in a few. Typically they might begin with a contextual introduction followed by the story, often with the moral underlined at the end. Setting the context was often necessary as a guide to the story's interpretation, as in the case of the political meaning of The Frogs Who Desired a King and The Frogs and the Sun. Sometimes the titles given later to the fables have become proverbial, as in the case of killing the Goose that Laid the Golden Eggs or the Town Mouse and the Country Mouse. In fact, some fables such as The Young Man and the Swallow appear to have been invented as illustrations of already existing proverbs. One theorist indeed went so far as to define fables as extended proverbs. In this they have an aetiological function, the explaining of origins, such as in another context, why the ant is a mean, thieving creature. Other fables also verging on this function are outright jokes, as in the case of The Old Woman and the Doctor, aimed at greedy practitioners of medicine. Origins: The contradictions between fables already mentioned and alternative versions of much the same fable, as in the case of The Woodcutter and the Trees, are best explained by the ascription to Aesop of all examples of the genre. Some are demonstrably of West Asian origin; others have analogues further to the East. Modern scholarship reveals fables and proverbs of Aesopic form existing in both ancient Sumer and Akkad as early as the third millennium BCE. Aesop's fables and the Indian tradition, as represented by the Buddhist Jataka Tales and the Hindu Panchatantra, share about a dozen tales in common, although often widely differing in detail. There is some debate over whether the Greeks learned these fables from Indian storytellers or the other way, or if the influences were mutual. Loeb editor Ben E. Perry took the extreme position in his book Babrius and Phaedrus that in the entire Greek tradition there is not so far as I can see a single fable that can be said to come either directly or indirectly from an Indian source, but many fables or fable motifs that first appear in Greek or Near Eastern literature are found later in the Panchatantra and other Indian story books, including the Buddhist Jatakas. Although Aesop and the Buddha were near contemporaries, the stories of neither were recorded in writing until some centuries after their death. Few disinterested scholars would now be prepared to make so absolute a stand as Perry about their origin in view of the conflicting and still emerging evidence.

The Best of Aesop's Fables, Will Jonson, 2014-10-07. Aesop's celebrated collection of fables has always been popular with both adults and children. These simple tales embody truths so powerful that the titles of the individual fables, the fox and the grapes, the dog in the manger, the wolf in sheep's clothing, and many others, have entered the languages and idioms of most European tongues.
