

LATIN AMERICA

During the 20th century, Latin America shifted from being a subcontinent of immigration to one of emigration.

Since the arrival of the first European in the late 15th century, the Americas have been one of the great destinations of migration. Today, only the USA and Canada retain that position. Latin America has shifted from being a subcontinent of immigration to one of emigration in an almost mirror image to that of the migration transition in Southern Europe and parts of East Asia. This recent transition has, nevertheless, been accompanied by intense urbanisation as well as by relatively small but significant flows into the interior.

The net migration for Central America is almost 12 million people, a figure mainly explained by the large movement from Mexico to the USA. A further net outflow of 7.7 million has occurred from South America, again dominated by migration to the north. However, the migration from South America has been less unidirectional than that from Central America and Mexico. Significant flows have taken place to Europe – in particular to Spain – retaining old colonial and language ties. Another significant “return flow” has been to Japan from Brazil and Peru. Since 1990, descendants of Japanese workers from the 1920s and 1930s have been recruited into factory employment in Japan.

Latin America is one of the most highly urbanised parts of the world. With 77 percent of its population classified as urban in mid-2007, the region is dominated by international migration from and to the larger cities. Migration within South America has been primarily between neighbouring states, with Argentina the largest regional destination. Mexico is a major transit zone to the USA from elsewhere in Central America, and it has to large numbers of Guatemalans, for example. Mexico has also received a significant number of migrants from the USA, as Mexicans return home with their US-born children.

The Hispanic population within the USA has grown both in number and in terms of the proportion it represents of the total population. Although it is found throughout the whole of the USA, it is concentrated in the southern and western states, and in Texas, New Mexico, and Southern California, in particular.
