Credit Risk Modeling

Success comes out of measuring because what cannot be measured cannot be managed.

It has been observed that over the past few years, a remarkable change has come in the way credit risk is being measured. In contrast to the accounting-driven concept that is relatively dull, and routine in nature, new technologies and methodologies have emerged among a new generation of financial engineering professionals who are now applying their engineering skills and analysis in this area.

The primary reason for this changes are:

- Matured market for the market risk gaining importance: given the maturity of market risk models, and the experience gained over the past decades, the market risk area has evolved in a way that frees resources and welcomes new challenges, such as credit and operational risk.
- Disintermediation of borrowers : With the capital markets expanding and becoming accessible to small and middle market firms, borrowers are more or less left behind to raise funds from banks and other traditional financial institutions that are more likely to be smaller and have weaker credit ratings. Capital market growth has impacted on the credit portfolio structure of the transactional financial institutions.
- Competitive margin structure : although there is a decline in the average quality of loans that has resulted due to the disintermediation process, the respective margin spreads, have lessened, or in other words the risk premium trade-off from lending turned worse. There can be a number of reasons for this; one of the important factors is the enhanced competition for lower quality borrowers.
- Change in bankruptcies : In spite of the fact that the most recent recessions hit at different times in different countries, bankruptcy statistics have been on the high, compared to the prior economic downsides.
- Diminishing and volatile values of collaterals : coupled with the ongoing Asian crisis, banking crises in well-developed countries have shown that real estate values and precise asset values are hard to predict and realize through liquidation. The
