Introduction

Reflection and reflective practice are two of the key buzzwords in professional and education practice at present. But what exactly do we mean by these terms and how can we develop our capacity for reflection? This article focuses on how to become more reflective in your professional practice whether as a clinician or educator. In it we define what we mean by reflection, identify the key stages in reflective practice and outline the main reflective practice skills.

Reflection on current practices

Before bringing about a change to current practices, the clinician needs to reflect on what is currently being practiced and what changes are required. A key factor in determining whether change is needed is the 'evidence base' relevant to the situation under consideration.

One of the most difficult tasks for educators is to help learners to relate theory to practice and reflection is one of the most important factors in achieving this synthesis. Unless this link is made then simply reading up on the evidence base is of little practical value. 'Evidence based practice needs to retain a practical focus and to build on reflective practice' (1).

This process is referred to as 'reflection on action' that is, it takes place after an event. Another aspect to reflective practice is 'reflection in action,' a more immediate reflection that takes place during the action. (2,3,4)

Reflective learning is 'the process of internally examining and exploring an issue of concern, triggered by an experience, which creates and clarifies meaning in terms of self, and which results in a changed conceptual perspective.' (2) In the discussion process of reflection, stages or levels of reflection have been identified. Mezirow identified seven steps of reflectivity in hierarchy, however Atkins in her analysis of the literature found that the differences between authors' accounts of the reflective processes are largely those of terminology, detail and the extent to which the processes are arranged in hierarchy. (2) She identified the following three key stages in the reflective processes:

Stages in reflective practice

1. Awareness - The first stage is triggered by an awareness of uncomfortable feelings and thoughts. This may arise because of some situation or event which does not unfold in the way we would expect. For example there may be an unexpected negative outcome of a usually reliable treatment option or perhaps a strong emotional reaction on the part of a learner. Of course it is also possible for surprising positive outcomes to leave us wondering what is the reason for the event. Either way there is some 'out of the ordinary' experience which causes us to begin reflecting.
