

A CRITICAL CONTEST

fantasy. The recognition that both images are densely rhetorical products of material, and aesthetic practices is suppressed.¹¹

Acknowledging the debt the essayists in The Critical Image owe to British art radical art theory, John Tagg (now teaching in the United States) is interviewed in a coda to the essays preceding. This dialogue with Joanne Lukitsch fleshes out the already-assumed theoretical axioms that provide critical bedrock for the other thirteen writers. Tagg, in describing the thrust of his writing, also describes the intellectual position touted by The Critical Image:

... try to build up from the Althusserian account of the state, to understand representational practices in the terms of that model, then to slot in Foucault's analyses of power/knowledge relations merely as a development or extension of Althusser. This would be a way of analyzing the micro-levels of photographic documentation, to blow apart the 1980s ideas of radical documentary, to talk about the power relations involved in practice, and yet to maintain a claim to being engaged in a thoroughly politicized activity.¹²

In contradistinction, the diversity of the theoretical positions in Context would not permit such a neat summary of intention. The Context of Meaning is aptly titled; therein one confronts a rich constellation between various modes of radical thought. When confronted by the Kleinbauer-Szarkowski model of consciousness, however, these two anthologies present a united front as a "substantial body of writing: . . . that treats the entire spectrum of photographic practice as a process of signification,"¹³ and not simply (to return to Szarkowski) as a unique vehicle for the artist to seek "new structures in which to order and simplify his sense of the reality of life."¹⁴
