CRITICAL WRITING IN THE ACADEME

Academic writing is far from a one-size-fits-all genre. Applicable to the broad variety of academic disciplines and their unique approaches to conducting and documenting research efforts in the field, one might find it challenging to identify clearly what constitutes academic writing.

Defining Critical Academic Writing

According to the University of Birmingham publication, "A short guide to critical writing for Postgraduate Taught students,"

"Critical writing is an involvement in an academic debate. It requires a refusal to accept the conclusions of other writers without evaluating the arguments and evidence they provide."

A Lancaster University publication adds that "The aim of academic writing is not to present the right answer," but to discuss the controversies in an intelligent way."

Here are tips to help you reflect critical thinking in critical academic writing.

- Be sure to answer the right and relevant questions.
- Give enough contexts so that the reader can follow your ideas and understand your principles.
- Include references to the material you have read.
- Try to group different studies thematically or categorically and make links between ones that are related.
- Explain source material to your readers to show why it is valuable and relevant.
- Discuss the ideas that come from these source texts in your writing.
- Justify your judgments. Say why you think an idea is relevant, valid or interesting.
- Acknowledge the drawbacks or limitations of ideas, even the ones you disagree with.
- Avoid absolute statements. Use hedging language to make your statements more convincing.
