Introduction

Security is a central concept and a necessary component for the continued existence of humankind. Security is at the fulcrum of the creation of numerous regional and international institutions, such as the Caribbean Community (CARICOM), United Nations (UN), North Atlantic Treaty Organization (NATO), and the European Union (EU). Security has always been given prominence in the academic disciplines of International Relations and Politics; however, starting with the seminal work of Buzan (1983), the concept of security began attracting a multiplicity of authors and researchers from disparate fields and different parts of the global community in the search of different, enhanced, and/or contemporary models of security away from traditional concepts of security that existed before the end of the pre-Cold War period.

Robinson (2010) points out that the work of Buzan (1998) led to a diversification and a broadening of the concept and foci of security to include political, economic, societal, and ecological elements that were notably absent prior to the end of the Pre-Cold war period. Historically, security studies has long been recognized as a sub-discipline of International Relations (IR); however, security studies is also entrenched within a plethora of social sciences disciplines, but none more preminent than IR.

As with many other disciplines that have gone critical, “security studies” underwent a change in its ontology and epistemology and went critical (McCormack 2009). For influential proponents of “critical security studies” (CSS), such as Keith Krause, Michael C. Williams, and Ken Booth, among many other widely studied scholars, to be “critical” meant positioning oneself against the established Realist and Positivist traditions associated with traditional security, for example, the conventional study of security with a primary focus on the state as the referent object of security and military forces. It is in this regard, that in the twenty-first century, the term “Critical Security Studies” has come to occupy a prominent place within the lexicon of IR and security studies (Browning and McDonald 2011).
