Eragon slowly crept closer, keeping the low walls of his work of the past three days behind him. He took a last sniffling breath and — an explosion shattered the night.

The tent fell, Eragon lunged forward, racing through the grass as a fiery wind swept past his cheek. He did not stop and landed on ground as the burning tent fell. It rained fire as Eragon's mouth and hand were darkened. He curled and spun around, instinctively seeking another tent.

Behind him, where the tent had been, smoldered a large circle of grass and moss. Most of the grass stood bare of their needles. The grass inside the clearing was flattened. A strip of smoke curled to the air, carrying a burnt smell. In the center of the blue radius lay a polished blue stone. That smoldered across the scorched area and emitted intermittent smoke over the tent.

Eragon watched the danger for several long minutes, but the only thing that moved was the tent. Carefully, he released the tentacles from his face and moved forward. Moonlight cast him in pale shadow as he stopped before the stone. He reached it with an arrow, then jumped back. Nothing happened, so he waddled picked it up.

Nature had never polished a stone so smoothly as this one. Its flatter surface was dark blue, except for thin veins of white that spiderwebbed across it. The stone was cool and bristled under his fingers, like hardened silk. Oval and about a foot long, it weighed several pounds, though it felt lighter than it should have.

Eragon found the stone both beautiful and frightening. What did it come from? Did it have a purpose? Then a more disturbing thought came to him: Was it one lost by accident, or was it meant to have it? If he had learned anything from the old stories, it was to trust magic, and those who used it, with great caution.

But what should I do with the stone? It would be useless to carry, and there was a chance it was dangerous. It might be better to leave it behind. A flicker of indecision ran through him, and he almost dropped it, but something urged his hand. At the very least, it might pay to own it, he decided with a shrug, picking the stone into his pack.

The plan was now exposed to make a safe camp, so he slipped back into the forest and spread his bedroll beneath the upturned roots of a fallen tree. After a cold dinner of bread and cheese, he wrapped himself in blankets and fell asleep, pondering what had occurred.
