World Atlas of Natural Hazards ,2004

World Atlas of Natural Hazards Bill McGuire,2004 In the opening year of the new millennium an astonishing one in every thirty people on the planet were affected by floods storms earthquakes volcanic eruptions and other natural phenomena Rapid onset geophysical hazards natural hazards or geohazards have always exacted a devastating toll on society both in terms of damage to property and infrastructure and loss of life During the last millennium it is estimated that over 12 million deaths resulted from over one hundred thousand natural catastrophes triggered by geohazards In the 20th century alone the numbers of lives lost may be as high as 3 5 million and there is little sign at present of the situation improving In fact the last three decades have seen a dramatic and worrying escalation both in the numbers of natural catastrophes caused by geohazards and in the accompanying economic and insured losses This is partly due to the increasing concentration of both people and wealth in regions of high vulnerability but the situation is exacerbated by extreme events associated with climate change and by direct human action such as deforestation and urbanisation The World Atlas of Natural Hazards presents an authoritative yet accessible picture of the perils our planet and our society currently face and a view of the range and scale of threats that may be expected in the new century and beyond The atlas incorporates a narrative that is driven by maps images and graphics to paint portraits of natural hazards in space and time the manner in which they impinge upon our society and what we can do to avoid mitigate or manage their worst excesses New research that sheds light on processes and mechanisms is addressed along with established and innovative methodologies designed to limit the
