

Globalisation and Deglobalisation: The Impact and the Alternatives

Global inequalities are now as extreme as they were at the peak of Western imperialism in the early 20th century, as the World Inequality Report 2022 makes clear (Chancel et al., 2022). The global income share of the poorest half of the world's population is only around half of what it was in 1920, before the great colonial divergence. Meanwhile, within-country inequalities have grown even faster, with income and wealth inequalities exploding at the very top of the distribution and private wealth almost wiping out publicly held assets in many countries. Things got worse during the COVID-19 pandemic, according to Oxfam (2022): the wealth of the top 1% increased dramatically and that of the ten richest men doubled, while 99% of humanity became poorer.

Extreme inequality of assets, incomes and opportunities does not only create unjust, unhealthy and unhappy societies – it actually kills people. In the past few years, millions of people have died after they contracted infectious diseases without getting vaccinated in time, because they did not get essential hospital care or oxygen when they needed it, because of shortages in underfunded public health systems, or because other illnesses and diseases were not treated in time.

Since then, and even more since the war in Ukraine and the subsequent increases in global prices of food and fuel, people have died of hunger without the means to buy food. Many have experienced despair and desperation at the loss of livelihood and this has been exacerbated by the fact that their governments could not or would not provide the social protection needed to survive the crisis.

Curiously, these terrible but avoidable outcomes were the result of both globalisation and deglobalisation. Decades of neoliberal globalisation involved a refashioning of global and national rules to favour large private capital, in the form of financial and real investments and greater “ease of doing business”. It was associated with major privatisations: of public assets, of natural resources, of essential services (such as health, education and sanitation), of major amenities that were earlier seen as “natural monopolies” (like electricity) and even of knowledge (through intellectual property rights). It involved deregulation of other markets, leading to less protection of labour and the environment.

This led to sharp declines in public wealth across the world and extreme concentrations of assets in the hands of a few multinational corporations and rich individuals. Inequality also reduced mass consumption demand, making for lower levels of economic activity and therefore employment. Meanwhile, technological changes added to inequality by reducing demand for many types of workers.

The popular backlash against globalisation that is now being felt in most parts of the world reflects all this, as well as the geopolitical tensions that have created incentives for different trading and financial blocs to form. Unfortunately, the current deglobalisation also remains fundamentally neoliberal in its nature and inspiration, replacing a global covenant with a more petty nationalist one, but continuing to privilege big capital and the rich in favour of
