

D. H. LAWRENCE'S LETTERS

TO

BERTRAND RUSSELL

INTRODUCTION

The antagonistic friendship of D. H. Lawrence and Bertrand Russell endured for a little more than a year.

Not long after they met in 1915, the two men planned to give a series of lectures together in London. Both Lawrence and Russell were opposed to war and were distressed by the one then going on in Europe. But instead of establishing a common front, they became involved in a little war of their own. Its story is told in these twenty-three letters from Lawrence to Russell.

They contain some of Lawrence's most intense utterances, for during that period (early 1915 to early 1916) he was going through a tormenting spiritual crisis.

It was not only the war that agitated him: 1915 was the year in which the most important book he had yet written was suppressed because a magistrate decreed that this novel was indecent. For several years after the trouble over The Rainbow, Lawrence found it almost impossible to earn money by writing, and he had no other income. Later in the war he was to become

SO poor that he could not afford to buy fuel for his cottage— he had to burn chips he picked up after trees had been cut down for use in the war industries. Another cause of wretchedness at the time was the hatred that he felt was being directed against him by the authorities and by people in general because his wife was German.

Most of Lawrence's closest friends during those troubled years were aristocrats. With the exception of John Middleton
