Baker's journey is not straightforward. It's a mix of the familiar and the mysterious, the simple and the complex. And yet, your grandparents knew how to bake bread, and so did their grandfathers. It's not that they were wizards, and magic isn't involved. The most basic ingredients for baking bread are simple: flour, water, and salt. They're mixed together and left to ferment for a number of days to form a sourdough starter. The starter is then fed with fresh flour and water to keep it alive, fermenting. This allows for a variety of breads, from the light and airy to the dense and flavorful. The longer the fermentation, the stronger the flavor. This sourdough is then used to make a variety of breads, from the simple to the complex. So, bakers have started their many years old. Bread can be made much more quickly with yeast, which is added to the dough. The kick starts the fermentation, and the bread is made in a few hours rather than a few days. All the ingredients are mixed together and kneaded, and left to rise. Bulk fermentation is then shaped, and proofed, and baked. Different flour and water ratios in bread production result in very varying flour, the most common being whole wheat flour, and whole wheat flour. These contain the most gluten. To make a good thick roux is formed, and bread needs to be baked at a very high temperature in the region of 220°C or above. However, the not true of enriched doughs, though they will burn at the high temperature. Finally, it's important to let the bread cool sufficiently before diving in. Baking is the bread while it is still hot, with a high level of steam, and will result in a loaf that is dry and underbaked. You will be rewarded.
