□ Abstract—There continues to be a debate on the indications for and value of emergency department thoracotomy, especially with regard to thoracotomies performed by emergency physicians. The current literature does not deal specifically with thoracotomies performed by an emergency physician on trauma patients in full cardiopulmonary arrest in a setting with no immediate surgical backup. This paper reports the results of 6 years of experience by one emergency physician in such a setting involving 80 patients, with a 6% overall survival rate, including two patients who survived blunt traumatic cardiac arrests. This lends support to emergency-physician-performed thoracotomies on trauma patients in "extremis," even in the setting of a hospital with no immediate surgical backup.

Introduction

The question of emergency department versus operating room thoracotomy and cardiorrhaphy remains a controversial issue, and proponents of both methods have published supportive data.<sup>1-27</sup> Even more controversial is the emergency physician-performed thoracotomy. Often this procedure is the "last chance" for the trauma victim who arrives at a hospital that is not staffed by an in-house trauma surgeon. The purpose of this study was to determine whether emergency physician-performed thoracotomy can be useful—even where surgical backup is not immediately available—for patients who are essentially dead on arrival (DOA—no pulse, blood pressure, or respirations) due to penetrating and blunt trauma.

Materials and Methods

Prior to this study, the technique of emergency department thoracotomy was mastered by repeated training on anesthetized kid goats until the initial incision, insertion of retractor, pericardiotomy, cross-clamping of the aorta, and initiation of
