

"The girl had waved to Norah and called to her. Though Norah had not understood the words, the meaning had been clear. She'd been calling for help. And Norah had not responded, not then, not later. She had let Karl Droste talk her out of doing the minimal duty of a civilian—reporting the commission of a crime. How many times, Norah asked herself, had she condemned those who were either too frightened or too uncaring and used spurious arguments as an excuse for not getting involved? And here she was doing exactly the same thing, she had not answered Karl Droste when he'd asked what the police could do in the circumstances. It was now up to her to make sure that these things were done. She got in her car and headed for town . . ."
