In the study, the disadvantaged children living in the province of Kilis form the universe, while the students included in the project form the sample. In the study, the changes in the emotional and behavioral communication of the participants, which are included in the communication skills, were evaluated by giving training to the students in 5 different sports branches for 16 weeks, 2 days and 4 hours a week. In the study, the description was made in the scanning model, which is one of the quantitative research methods. In the study, the data obtained from 109 people determined by random method among 320 individuals who participated in the project voluntarily were evaluated. A questionnaire consisting of demographic information and communication skills inventory was used in the measurement tool of the study. In the analysis of the data, demographic variables were processed using the JASP statistical program, percentage and frequency, and other analyzes were processed with t-test, one-way analysis of variance and correlation tests at $p < 0.05$ significance level. As a result of the research, it was understood that the majority of the participants were Turkish and women, disadvantaged individuals between the ages of 11-12 and at the 6th grade level with low income. Communication skills and the behavioral and emotional communication skills included in it are behaviors that can be developed in sports, recreation and other activities. Considering that disadvantaged individuals will be more in socio-cultural change, non-governmental organizations and policy makers should give importance to these and similar projects.

The process of integration of disadvantaged individuals with changing life is quite complex and brings difficulties with itself. Especially in cities, this lifestyle turns into a complex set of relationships and creates social communication problems that are very important for the individual and society. For example, the development of children growing up without a family in orphanages is influenced by abandonment and the traumatic experience resulting from the lack of a family environment, which has a decisive effect on children's attitudes in personality and society, affecting the individual's internal structure and overall development, including interpersonal skills (Tomescu et al., 2021). Therefore, it shows that children who have not developed social skills have some problems in their interpersonal, professional
