and reports The Global Politics of Abortion Jodi L. Jacobson,1990 Locating the issue of abortion in a global public policy context with the array of public health human rights and social questions that are implicated is the aim of this paper Abortion laws around the world have been liberalized since the 1950s with a resultant decrease in abortion related mortality among women The proportion of the world s population governed by laws that permit abortion on medical or broader social and economic grounds is 75 percent nearly 4 billion people In addition to women living in those countries that have resisted liberalization of their abortion laws many women have restricted access to abortion even those in countries in which abortion is technically legal There are a number of reasons for this including a lack of government or public commitment to provide or fund services lack of trained specialists administrative roadblocks a woman s ability to pay and a lack of truthful information about legal rights and services Abortion rates from countries around the world are examined and discussed in terms of the varying demographic and social realities The large number of maternal deaths due to abortion that still occur is not due to a deficiency in technology but a deficiency in the value placed on women s lives The numerous roadblocks to safe abortion services drive women to seek illegal or clandestine abortions that greatly endanger their lives The debate surrounding abortion has been too often portrayed as a conflict between black and white hues The debate needs to take place in a larger context complete with public health family planning and human rights concerns Equality of political rights for women and likely the lives of many hinges on political decisions regarding abortion DB
