

5 WAYS TO WRITE BETTER PARAGRAPHS

INTRODUCTION

When writing/editing paragraphs we have to focus not just on the strength of the individual sentences, but also on how those sentences work together to create a strong, cohesive, and entertaining paragraph.

While it might seem counter intuitive at first, most paragraph level problems are actually caused by a lack of strong voice and perspective. We can write strong sentences and we can write strong scenes, but it's on the paragraph level that we really build and develop voice. I'm hoping that through these five tips I can help you both write better paragraphs and strengthen your voice/POV.

As with everything in fiction writing, these recommendations aren't set in stone. If you have a creative or logical reason to ignore any piece of writing advice, please do so.

1. AVOID MONOTONOUS SENTENCE STRUCTURE

Monotonous sentence structure can take a variety of different forms, and many writers have structures they lean on more than others, but by far the most common culprit of monotonous writing is over reliance on starting every sentence with a subject followed by a verb. For example:

He walked into the store. He grabbed a cart. He walked to the produce. He picked up a head of broccoli. He put it into his cart.

I want to be totally clear that this is not a bad structure at all. Starting with the subject is ideal for action because it prevents passive voice. However, when the structure is used in several back-to-back sentences, it creates a monotonous sound.

Sometimes this type of monotony can be improved by combining the sentences together so that the actions take fewer sentences to describe. For example:

He walked into the store, grabbed a cart, then walked to the produce. He picked up a head of broccoli and put it into his cart.

This sounds less monotonous because we use "he" less often, but it's not a huge improvement because we still have a lot of word repetition ("walked" is used twice, "into" is used twice, and two clauses end in "cart"). We can improve this paragraph a bit more by eliminating the repetition:

He walked inside the store, grabbed a cart near the entrance, then shuffled over to the produce. He picked up a head of broccoli and put it into his empty cart.

In the rewrite above, "into" is replaced with "inside," near the entrance is added to avoid ending two clauses with "cart," and "empty" is added in front of the second instance of "cart" to give it a different sound. Lastly, we changed one instance of "walked" to "shuffled."
