Neild, Flinders University. School of Medicine. Human Physiology, Adult Learning Styles and the Effectiveness of Computer Based Training: An Untilled Research Field, 2001 During the first half of this project numerous computer based classes have been developed to enable asynchronous instruction to be provided to health care professionals Previous research has proven the effectiveness of computer based training and this project has endeavored to elucidate which particular methods are most acceptable to the various student populations Clinicians are an especially impatient student population They will not embrace a cumbersome program that takes an excessive amount of time to download even if there is a significant educational benefit Bells and whistles such as imbedded video and interactivity are desirable to the point where they impede completion time of the module of instruction Most physicians would prefer a simple page turner digital product to an imbedded video presentation that drags on and on The loss of control of pace inherent to a streaming video product is considered sub optimal In addition during this project it is not practical to expect ready availability of the high band width required to produce a high quality video presentation Band width issues can be ameliorated through alternate delivery vehicles such as CD ROM The infrastructure developed during the first half of this project has allowed on line delivery of learning objects as well as testing of students A knowledge management system has been purchased which allows tracking of student completion of modules or failure to do so It has also allowed the investigators to capture objective measures of student performance e g test scores on individual blocks of instruction
