The word 'modelling' has no technical definition that fits the broad spectrum of its applications in the modern world; therefore, it evokes the BIM users to connect Modelling with creating 3d models. To solve this issue, I have published my research that gives a possible general definition for the word Modelling.

Definition of 'Modelling' in the Context of Computers

"Modelling" is the execution of functions by transforming and exchanging the existing knowledge by simulating realities or assumptions to produce more knowledge, decisions, references, and to create more models, accumulating in array or nest, but iteratively to accumulate knowledge. Knowledge is represented in models. However, in modelling, the knowledge is realised by the lives and improved with simulations by displaying, demonstrating, experiencing, and communicating; OR delivering real-world functions of the machines.

In BIM, knowledge is information, and the Model represents the information, but Modelling simulates the representation and helps to make decisions or to realise and improve the information.

However, the definition of Information Modelling is for another day. ☺
