

Little Japanese girls very often look like dolls, and rarely do perfect Japanese dolls (painted and dressed in faces and living in glass cases because they are so delicate and expensive to be handled) look like little girls. March 3, the day for honoring the girlhood in Japan (Doll Festival), should also be Girls' Day in Japan. The dolls of the day for honoring the girlhood in Japan—the dolls that attract the attention on this day are dolls so splendid that they are a dream of playing with them.

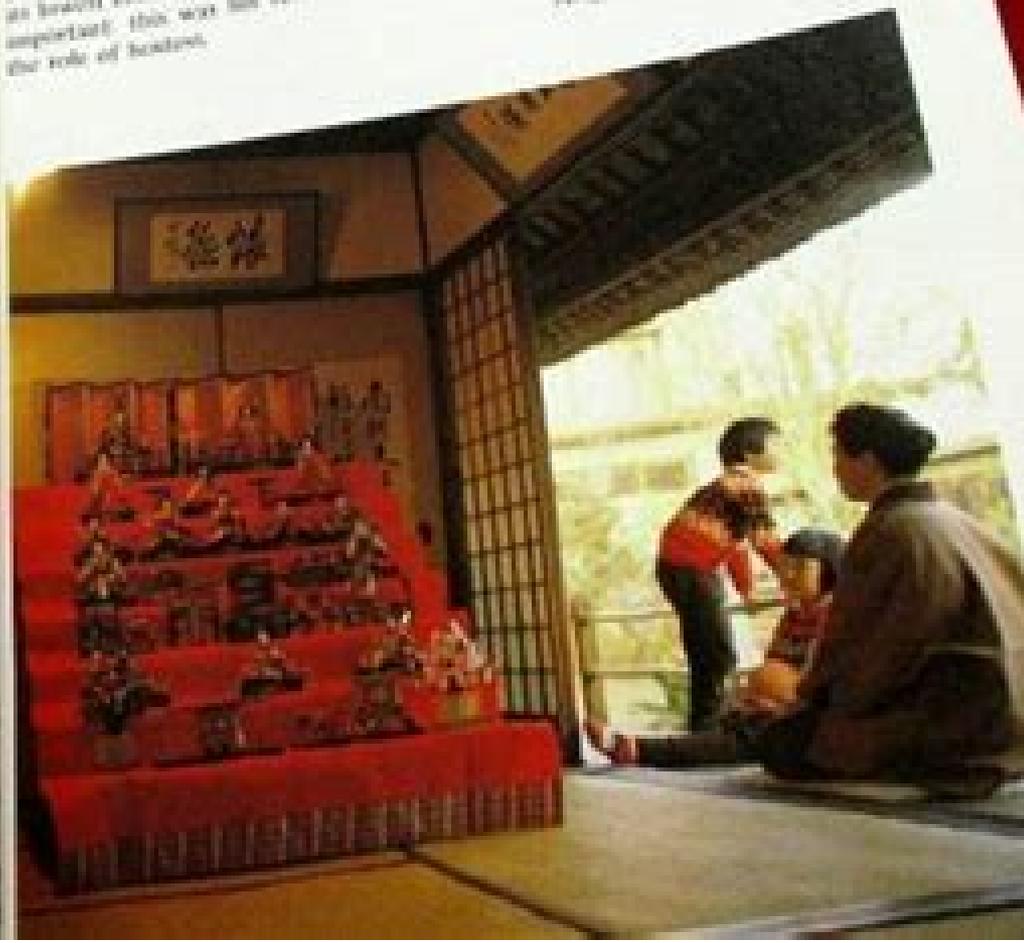

On March 3, girls dress up and invite their friends to partake of special refreshments and to admire the dolls. The dolls are scrupulously laid out on stepped shelves. After her marriage, she would add to it when a girl was born to her. After the display for about two weeks, the dolls and furniture are Hinamatsuri has its origins in the ancient practice of ritual purification, in which people decorated their trees with paper dolls and threw the dolls into the river, and in the custom of placing up offerings in the spring. It was in the Edo period (1603-1867) that the dolls came to be made of paper. Curiously, the Doll Festival reached its pinnacle of popularity during this period, a time when the status of women in Japan had reached its lowest ebb. Hinamatsuri was the one occasion when a girl left her room and played the role of hostess.
