do so This book presents seventeen new essays on these questions drawing together perspectives from philosophy and psychology The first section explores the ethics of belief from an individualistic framework It begins by examining the question of doxastic voluntarism i e the extent to which people have control over their beliefs It then shifts to focusing on the kinds of character that epistemic agents should cultivate what their epistemic ends ought to be and the way in which these issues are related to other traditional questions in epistemology The section concludes by examining questions of epistemic value of whether knowledge is in some sense primary and of whether the ethics of belief falls within the domain of epistemology or ethics The second section extends this traditional debate to issues concerning the social dimensions of belief formation It begins with essays by social psychologists discussing the past three decades of research in lay epistemics It continues by examining Humean Kantian and feminist insights into the social aspects of belief formation as well as questions concerning the ethics of assertion The section concludes with a series of essays examining a topic that is currently of great interest to epistemologists namely the significance of peer disagreement

Planning, Time, and Self-Governance Michael E. Bratman, 2018-06-01 Our capacity for planning agency is central to our human lives These essays aim both to deepen our understanding of basic norms that guide our plan infused thinking and to defend their status as norms of practical rationality This defense appeals both to forms of pragmatic support and to the ways in which these norms track conditions of a planning agent s self governance both at a time and over time
