NIEBUHR THE STRUCTURE OF NATION

It was as though Andrew Ames had leaned forward, a quarter of a century ago, over a sticky textured table—just as he leaned forward habitually every day over his smooth and sterile laboratory table. It was as though he had taken, from the living matter on that distant mountain-and-plain planet, a nucleus of an idea—just as he might have plucked a live nucleus of a human cell and transplanted it to a receptive clone leg. To make something alive. Like and live.

Andrew Ames had closed intellectually a way of life, one his ancestral set of values, as though it were some embryo of the human species. And now it was fighting its way out toward light, but not toward the synthetic light of his home planet, he thought, as, traveling through space, he studied Earth 10° vertically through a continuously decreasing distance. His home planet was now steadily stimulating a son, a particular to the theme, a chain reaction to the universe, emitting its own synthesized means of light. The light which would fall, in its own inherent purity and excitement, across his idea, would be real, actual, sun-bath-warming sunlight. And like an emerging human creature: his idea, dependent upon so many factors, would it would not survive in its rather hostile environment.
