

Wetlands: Archaeology and Nature Conservation: An Antipodean View

W E BOYD, I M DUTTON, A SPECHT AND M M COTTER

Abstract

This commentary offers an overview of issues concerning the management of wetlands in Australia, with particular regard for nature conservation and the cultural (mainly archaeological) heritage. Whereas the legal, social and administrative structures, and indeed the archaeological environment, are somewhat different in Australia compared to those in other parts of the world, there are several parallels which arise out of a commonality of issue and concern. These can provide a useful input to discussions of such issues in, for example, the British context. Present issues in archaeological heritage management concern legal arguments regarding the relative importance of types of sites, recently influenced by major changes in the legality of native title in Australia. On the other hand, issues in natural environment management concern the need to reverse a history of habitat destruction and administrative and legal complexity. Recent developments in both areas reflect important social changes in attitudes; changes which are likely in the long term to strengthen the processes of management, to increase the protection of both the cultural and natural heritage, and to foster an integration of cultural and natural heritage management.

Archaeological Context of Wetland Archaeology

Wetland archaeology in Australia is, for the moment, undeveloped; the emphasis in archaeology in this driest of inhabited continents is, not surprisingly, dryland archaeology. The context of Australian archaeology revolves round a long and continuous Aboriginal history of the continent, characterised by hunter-gatherer economics and societies and their typical associated material remains, a contact history over the last 500 years or so between the indigenous population and various peoples from islands in south-east Asia and further afield and, finally, a short European history of colonial and post-colonial settlements and industrial development. This history generally has not found its way into the wetlands of Australia, partly due to the relative scarcity of wetlands, but also due to the lack of need for people to inhabit wetlands. Wetlands were certainly exploited, but rarely (if ever) inhabited. Notable archaeological exceptions to this lack of wetland archaeological heritage include: a 10,000-year-old boomerang preserved in the peat of Wylie Swamp, South Australia; the abundant stone fish traps occurring in the intertidal zone in many regions of Australia's coastline; inland fish trap systems found in many river systems, including the famous Condah Lake system in Victoria; and the recently excavated Pleistocene human occupation and megafauna site at Cuddie Springs, in northern New South Wales (e.g., Flood 1989; Dodson et al. 1993; Clarke 1994).

A particularly important aspect of Aboriginal culture, and thus of Aboriginal heritage, is the relationship of site within landscapes. Aboriginal culture is a
