Following liberalisation, Indian financial services firms need to focus on customer satisfaction if they are to survive in a more competitive environment, note Dr Sanjay K. Jain and K. Shivakumar.

Organising is an important managerial function. No organisation can think of surviving today in the absence of a well-defined organisational structure and proper staffing and co-ordination of its activities. A number of organisational systems and models have been proposed over time to cope with the varying and changing requirements of business organisations. In other words, customer satisfaction in such organisations becomes the focal point. Each employee of the organisation, irrespective of the department he or she belongs to, strives towards this goal. Not only the marketing staff but also people from other departments start increasingly aiming at customer satisfaction.

When customer orientation permeates all levels in an organisation it facilitates clarity of focus and vision for the efforts of various individuals and departments. A number of empirical studies in the past have clearly demonstrated a positive relationship between customer orientation and business performance.

Need of the hour

Adoption of such an approach seems all the more important for financial services firms in a country like India which is on the
