

Q#3: Difference between long-term scheduler and short-term scheduler.

Ans: In the realm of operating systems, schedulers play a crucial role in managing the allocation of resources, particularly CPU time, among various processes. While both long-term and short-term schedulers contribute to this task, they differ significantly in their scope, objectives, and decision-making processes.

Long-Term Scheduler (LTS):

Focus: Overall system performance and resource utilization.

Scope: Determines which processes are admitted into the system and the degree of multiprogramming.

Decision Factors: Process priority, memory requirements, resource usage history, and overall system load.

Frequency: Less frequent, typically invoked when a new process arrives or when the system load changes significantly.

Objectives:

- Maximize CPU utilization.
- Maintain a balanced mix of processes to optimize resource usage.
- Prevent overloading the system with too many processes.

Short-Term Scheduler (STS):

Focus: Efficient CPU utilization and process execution.

Scope: Selects a process from the pool of ready processes to be allocated the CPU.

Decision Factors: Process priority, CPU burst time, I/O requirements, and the current state of the system.

Frequency: Very frequent, typically invoked every few milliseconds or whenever a process changes state (e.g., from running to waiting).

Objectives:

- Minimize CPU idle time.
- Ensure fairness in CPU allocation among ready processes.
- Meet deadlines for real-time processes.
