1. Psychological and social factors that causes the development of the disorders

Bill, a 25-year-old, single and unemployed. His sister appointed him to a mental-health center due to his peculiar behavior. He remembered himself to be clumsy, effeminate and spent most of his time alone or with his mother. Growing up he remembered his father as being harsh and distant where he expressed hostility and wished for his death.

Bill had always been a good student that the people around him expected him to pass in a good college, however, the prospect of selecting a profession struck as a threatening task. It also distinguished Bill's extensive adjustment problems, where he had issues sustaining relationships either romantic or between acquaintances. Supposing this issue he had several sexual experiences with both men and women.

His frequent or most of the time "daydreaming" posed interference in his daily activities which also concerned him. Throughout his work, he did not associate himself with others, and gradually became aloof, disorganized, and seemed preoccupied most of the time.

2. Struggles and difficulties experienced by the individual, family and the community in managing psychological disorders.

Bill's peculiar behavior and social isolation concerned her sister, who posed for her to set him an appointment in a mental health center. He spends most of his time daydreaming, talking to himself, and having hallucinations and delusions which assert to be a concern for his sister's family who has three young children. Bill expresses that his problem would be solved if he had stopped daydreaming. He had lived in intense fear, brooding about the conspiracies he believed that there's conspirators who did him a documentary film about his sexual activities and he was the reason for the death of people in the recent bombings in Ireland. Moreover, his isolation was a constant concern for her mother where Bill declared that his return to his mother's apartment made them both anxious about each other, for that reason he decided to reside in her sisters' house
