PHONOLOGICAL PROPERTIES OF CZECH VERSE AND PROSE COMPARED<sup>1</sup>

Abstract: This paper provides a quantitative phonological analysis of the complete works of six Czech poets in comparison with three Czech prose texts. The comparison is focused on degree of euphony according to criteria suggested by the Czech phonetician Bohuslav Hlaša. It is shown that verse shows lower values for most of the supposedly more euphonic phonological properties (such as the comparative frequency of vowels or open syllables), a finding that is supported by previous statistical analyses, even though these were based mostly on prose. Whether this means that prose is more euphonic than verse or that the criteria used are not reliable is an open question, but it strongly suggests that more attention should be paid to verse in phonological analyses of Czech.

Keywords: phonology, syllable, euphony, phonological corpus, poetry, prose, verse

1. Introduction

This paper offers a partial quantitative phonological analysis of Czech verse and prose. The complete poetic works of six poets are analyzed here, and the results are compared with three prose texts, two of which were written by two of the poets. The purpose of the comparison is to find out whether the two types of text differ and in what respect.

Although quantitative phonological analyses of Czech have already been published, the data upon which they were based either predominantly comprised prose texts (Štepanová et al. 2020) or the differences between prose and verse were not focused upon (Tilgnerová et al. 1983). The only comparison of these two types of text is that attempted by Malinská (1946). However, she analyzed only samples of prose and verse, not complete works. Her samples consisted of 210,000 words for prose and 150,000 words for verse.<sup>2</sup> What is more, she focused only on the frequency of sounds without considering other phonological properties such as syllabic structure.

Present-day methods make it possible to subject much larger bodies of data to a more detailed analysis. Taking advantage of existing electronic corpora, we have been able to treat our comparative statistical analysis on a database consisting of 660,000 phonemes for verse, and of 361,000 phonemes for prose. The comparison has been affected by issues of verse criteria suggested by the Czech phonetician Bohuslav Hlaša for determining the degree of euphony in verse. Hlaša's criteria were based on an intuitive assumption that some texts are more pleasing to the ear, i.e. are more euphonic, than others. Their purpose was to express this feeling in phonological terms. The expectation was that verse and prose would fare differently when subjected to these criteria, and that it was the former that would turn out to be more euphonic than the latter. Part of the purpose of this paper is thus to show whether this assumption was warranted or not.

<sup>1</sup>This paper was written with the help of data from the Corpus of Czech Verse created by the Institute of Czech Linguistics of the Academy of Sciences of the Czech Republic (<http://corpora.upol.cz/cv/>). The author is grateful to David Štepan for comments on an earlier version of this text; he has been financially helped. Thanks to my old consulting skills as the author's.
